

Jihad: Between War and Peace

Suleman Dangor

Introduction

The term jihad means striving, endeavouring, making an effort, exerting oneself or fighting. Yet jihad is associated in the popular mind with force, violence and conflict. The fact that several current Muslim resistance movements have proclaimed jihad against their occupiers (e.g. in Iraq) or their own governments (e.g. in Algeria), are using Islamic symbols to depict their cause and resorting to kidnapping, beheading and martyrdom operations (commonly known as 'suicide bombings') reinforces this perception.

The term jihad has been used by Muslim scholars to refer to peaceful activities, e.g. the intellectual effort by jurists to arrive at a judicial ruling, propagation of Islam through speech and writing, spiritual development through physical and moral discipline, etc. Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, the famous Indian Muslim scholar and leader of the Indian National Congress before independence, and later federal education minister in India offered the following explanation of jihad:

There are serious misconceptions regarding what is jihad. Many people think that jihad means only to fight. The critics of Islam too labour under this misunderstanding, whereas to think thus is to utterly narrow the practical scope of this sacred commandment. Jihad means to strive to the utmost. In the Quran and Sunna terminology, this utmost exertion, which is undertaken for the sake of truth rather than personal ends, is indicated by the word jihad. This effort could be with one's life, or property, or expenditure of time, or by bearing labour and hardship, or fighting the enemy and shedding blood.

To cite the French writer, Marcel A. Boisard, Muslim scholars distinguished between four types of jihad: the 'war' waged by the heart (the internal moral and spiritual struggle), the tongue (the effort of calm preaching), the hand (the effort to correct error and enforce good conduct) and the sword (armed conflict with the enemy of Muslims) (see Kolocotronis 1990:109).

Despite this, the only dimension of jihad that is commonly highlighted by the media and has become entrenched in the public image is the one involving the use of force. This meaning of jihad is so widespread that even Muslims immediately associate the term with conflict and war. For many, the peaceful pursuit of intellectual, moral and spiritual development seems virtually incongruous with the term jihad. This reduction of the term has been criticised by contemporary scholars such as Montasser Mir (1987:112) precisely because it detracts from its wider meaning, including private effort, social action, monetary expenditure, etc.

In this article, I will highlight the various dimensions of jihad, demonstrate that peace is the norm in Islam and assess the current prospect for global jihad. As a prelude, I will interrogate the causes of conflict in the Muslim World.

The Causes of Conflict in the Muslim World

Many scholars, analysts and observers charge that religion is a fundamental cause of conflict, citing as examples conflicts that have occurred between followers of different faiths or denominations, e.g. the Crusades (between Christians and Muslims), the war in Yugoslavia (between Bosnian Muslims and Serb Orthodox Christians and between the latter and Catholic Croats), and the India-Pakistan wars (between Muslims of Pakistan and Hindus of India). The current conflicts in the Gujarat state of India, northern Nigeria, and southern Sudan are all presumed to be motivated essentially by religious factors for the following reasons:

1. The conflicts are between two diverse faith groups, viz between Hindus and Muslims in India and between Christians and Muslims in Nigeria and the Sudan.
