

EXECUTIVE FUNCTIONING SKILLS

part

1

Time and Task Management

While the name brings up images of tiny business executives in suits, Executive Functioning is the brain's ability to make and execute plans. Below are descriptions of key time and task management EF skills and how they can impact school success.

1 ORGANIZATION

Lost homework, papers everywhere, messy backpacks and desks. This is the most visible EF deficit. But paper management is just the beginning. Students can also struggle with the organization of ideas, affecting essay writing and test-taking, or even organizing math problems on a page.

2 TASK INITIATION

We have all put off starting tasks, but some students are especially gifted at procrastinating homework until the last minute or looking busy while producing nothing. The root causes can vary - from emotional to attentional - but the result is often rushed or incomplete work.

3 TIME MANAGEMENT

Independently managing time over the short and long-term grows more important as students move into middle and high school and their workload increases. Without strong time management skills, students won't be able to keep up.

4 SUSTAINED ATTENTION

While some students' hyperactivity makes it obvious their attention is elsewhere, others can look focused while their heads are in the clouds. Over the long run, students with attentional challenges end up missing a lot of classroom content, resulting in skills deficits.

5 WORKING MEMORY

Think of working memory as your mind's whiteboard. It holds information for a short period of time so you can manipulate it. From solving math problems to remembering what you want to write, working memory plays a key role in accurately executing tasks.

6 PLANNING/PRIORITIZATION

Without efficient strategies for planning out projects or prioritizing what to study first, schoolwork can be even more of a challenge. Processes such as backwards planning give a framework for organizing tasks and breaking them down into manageable chunks.

7 GOAL-DIRECTED PERSISTENCE

Many tasks "boomerang" on students, where they have to problem-solve or switch gears before they can complete them. These are the skills needed to keep going in the face of obstacles.
