

Tapirs, Rhinoceroses

RHINOCEROTIDAE

Rhinoceros Family
Of the living perissodactyl mammals, only the rhinoceroses share the massive, with the dimensions that was so common among the antelope, some extinct ones among the antelope. There are 5 species of rhinoceroses, found in Africa and Southeast Asia, and all have large heads and small bodies. They are all herbivorous, feeding on grass and other plant material. The legs are short and thick, with short hooves. The skin is extremely tough, with only a few hairs. Males and females both have horns, but females tend to have smaller horns.

Asian Indian Rhinoceros, *Rhinoceros unicornis
RANGE: Nepal, N.E. India
HABITAT: grassland to swampy areas
Body: 4.2 m (13 ft 6 in)
Tail: 1.8 m (5 ft 9 in)

The largest of the Asian species, the Indian rhinoceros has a thick, dark-grey hide marked with many small protuberances. The skin follows deep folds at the joints, giving the rhinoceros an armor-plated appearance. Each year has a single horn on the head, but the female's horn is smaller. Generally a solitary animal, the Indian rhinoceros feeds in the morning and evening on grass, weeds and tree bark and some during the remainder of the day.

The female gives birth to a single young after a gestation of about 15 months. The young rhinoceros is active even after birth and is suckled for up to 2 years.

Asian Sumatran Rhinoceros, *Rhinoceros sumatrensis
RANGE: Sumatra, Thailand, Malaya
HABITAT: dense forest, near swamps
Body: 2.3-2.8 m (7 ft 6 in-9 ft 2 in)
Tail: about 40 cm (16 in)

The smallest member of its family, the Sumatran rhinoceros has two horns. Most of the female are smaller than the male's. Both horns are covered over the thick skin and fringe the edges of the nose. Sumatran rhinoceroses are usually solitary, although a male and female pair may live together. They feed mostly in the early morning and evening on ferns, tree bark and bamboo shoots and may trample down small trees to browse on their foliage. Like other rhinoceroses, this species has good hearing and sense of smell, but the sight is poor.

The female bears a single young after a gestation of about 7 to 8 months.

Asian, Sumatra-dipped White Rhinoceros, *Ceratotherium simum
RANGE: Africa, N.W. Uganda
HABITAT: savanna, floodplains
Body: 5.5 m (18 ft 1 in)
Tail: 40-50 cm (16-20 in)

The largest living land animal, the white rhinoceros has a long head, which is covered in bony armor, with a small horn. The rhinoceros is generally found in the savanna, but it may also be found in the floodplains. It is a herbivore, feeding on grass and other plant material.

Despite its size, the rhinoceros is a placid animal, usually feeding on grass. Each old male occupies his own territory, which may be shared by several males, but the female is usually accompanied by another male, with young or by her own young. They feed on grass throughout the day and night.

The female gives birth to a single young after a gestation of about 15 months. The calf suckles for 18 months and stays with its mother for 3 years, leaving her only when it is 3 years old.

Asian, Black Rhinoceros, *Rhinoceros blacki
RANGE: Africa, S. Chad and Sudan
HABITAT: South country, grassland
Body: 3-3.5 m (9 ft 8 in-11 ft 6 in)
Tail: 60-70 cm (24-28 in)

The black rhinoceros is, in fact, an antelope that carries according to its which it wallows. It has a long neck but has a large head, but not tall, which bears two horns. Sometimes a third small horn, but it is pointed and much smaller. The horns are covered in bony armor, with small bumps and ridges of small bony knobs. Like the white rhinoceros, black rhinoceroses live alone, except for males and young. Adults live in overlapping ranges, with boundaries marked by dung heaps.

Male and female rhinoceroses meet only a few days when mating. The female gives birth to a single young after a gestation of about 15 months. The young rhinoceros suckles for 18 months and stays with its mother for 3 years, leaving her only when it is 3 years old.
