

How the sediment moves and settles in a channel depends on many factors. A channel's sediment transport capacity is the ability of the channel to move sediment. It is determined by the channel's geometry, the sediment's properties, and the water's properties. The sediment transport capacity is the maximum amount of sediment that can be moved by the channel. It is determined by the channel's geometry, the sediment's properties, and the water's properties.

Sediment transport mechanisms

Sediment transport mechanisms are the processes by which sediment is moved from one place to another. There are three main mechanisms: bed load, suspended load, and dissolved load. Bed load is the sediment that is moved along the bottom of the channel. It is the most common mechanism. Suspended load is the sediment that is carried in the water column. It is the second most common mechanism. Dissolved load is the sediment that is carried in the water as dissolved ions. It is the least common mechanism.

There are many factors that affect sediment transport. The most important factors are the channel's geometry, the sediment's properties, and the water's properties. The channel's geometry includes the channel's width, depth, and slope. The sediment's properties include its size, shape, and weight. The water's properties include its velocity, viscosity, and density. All of these factors interact to determine the sediment transport capacity of a channel.
