1. Introduction

Fault diagnosis of analog circuits has been one of the most challenging topics for researchers and test engineers since the 1970s. Given the circuit topology and nominal circuit parameter values, fault diagnosis is to obtain the exact information about the faulty circuit based on the analysis of the limited measured circuit responses. Fault diagnosis of analog circuits is essential for analog and mixed-signal systems testing and maintenance both during the design process and the manufacturing process of VLSI ASICs.

There are three dominant and distinct stages in the process of fault diagnosis: fault detection to find out if the circuit under test (CUT) is faulty comparing with the fault-free circuit, or golden circuit (This stage is usually called test in industry), fault identification to locate where the faulty parameters are inside the faulty circuit, and parameter evaluation to obtain how much the faulty parameters deviated from their nominal values and to obtain values of other circuit parameters such as branch and nodal voltages. The bottlenecks of analog fault diagnosis primarily lie in the inherited features of analog circuits: nonlinearity, parameter tolerances, limited accessible nodes, and lack of efficient models. Multiple fault diagnosis techniques are even less developed than single-fault diagnosis because it is more difficult to interpret and detect multiple faults, particularly in the presence of tolerance or measurement noise. In addition, in multiple fault situation, one fault's effect on the circuit could be masked by the effects of the other faults. Generally speaking, there is no widely accepted paradigm for analog test or fault diagnosis even with the introduction of IEEE 1149.4 standard for mixed-signal test bus.

With recent sharp development of electronic design automation tools and widespread application of analog VLSI chips and mixed-signal systems in the area of wireless communication, networking, neural network and real-time control, the interests in analog test and fault
