

The Anti-Federalist Papers

Between October, 1787 and May, 1788, three prominent American statesmen, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton and John Jay wrote a series of essays which are known in constitutional history as The Federalist Papers. Designed to shape public opinion in favor of ratification [formal approval] of the new United States Constitution, they were first published in New York newspapers under the pseudonym (pen name) "Publius." The authors were members of a group known as the Federalists, a group which advocated the creation of a stronger and more central government in place of the existing confederation.

Yet many individual citizens of the new American Republic, especially those who made a living through agriculture and inhabited the more remote areas of the country, vigorously opposed the adoption of the new Constitution. Fearing that the newly created Federal Government would usurp the power of the People and State Legislatures, they have come to be known in history as the AntiFederalists. Their arguments against ratification appeared in various forms, by various authors, most of whom used a pseudonym. Collectively, these writings have become known as the Anti-Federalist Papers.

The 85 papers reflected on the following pages are offered as is, are an incomplete set of the huge quantity of actual historical documents (there were many, many objections to the constitution), and are not guaranteed to be exact copies of the original papers. Note also that there are many published and online sources for these papers, and they all appear to have been edited to one extent or another. This version of the documents was scanned for obvious copy errors (two joined words, etc.) and are reasonably readable as offered. If you have doubts about any term, phrase, or paper presented, it is suggested that you research for more accurate versions of these papers.
