

There is a lot of evidence demonstrating how words impact the person living with diabetes

- Language used in the media can be stigmatising
- Language used at diagnosis has a lasting impact on the person with diabetes
- Language around diabetes can be confusing, inaccurate, unrealistic and harmful
- Language affects self-management. For example, during a clinic experience a person can feel supported, understood and confident or belittled, criticised and patronised
- Language around diabetes can affect emotional wellbeing. People with diabetes report feelings of guilt, frustration, and anxiety around blood glucose levels and food choices which may be triggered by the language they hear around self-management
- Language contributes to social stigma which can include unhelpful comments and judgement leading to diabetes distress, depression and lowered self-esteem
- Language affects self-care, for example attending medical appointments and taking medication
- Language affects clinicians' attitudes
- Language isolates people affected by diabetes leading to loneliness
