THE BALTIC STATES

Years of Dependence, 1940-1980

By Romuald J. Misiunas and Rein Taagepera

In 1940, as a result of its non-aggression pact with Nazi Germany, the Soviet Union occupied and annexed the three Baltic states: Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. They had been a part of the Russian Empire since the eighteenth century, achieving political independence in 1918. Some observers thought political annexation in 1940 would result in the eventual assimilation of each state's social and cultural identity. While such predictions are still being voiced in the 1980s, the three national cultures have demonstrated a remarkable resilience in the face of Soviet domination.

This book describes and analyzes the contradictions of political dependence and cultural autonomy in the Baltic nations since their annexation. Four broad periods are identified: German and Soviet occupation dominated the war years (1940-1944). Post-war Stalinism (1945-1953) involved guerrilla resistance, collectivization through deportation, industrialization with imported labor, a build-up of native Communist parties, and the destruction of national cultures. During and after the Khrushchev thaw (1954-1960), there appeared a powerful resurgence of the three national cultures, economic improvement, and an intensive struggle for political autonomy. Contradictory trends have continued since 1960: increasingly centralized political and economic control by Moscow, westernization of culture and life style, continuing attempts at reunification through immigration and cultural imposition, consumerism accompanied by sporadic food shortages.
