The State of the Language Philip Howard, 1985 Is the English language in decline Many people seem to think so but Philip Howard isn't one of them The Literary Editor of The Times of London Howard takes a robust commonsensical view of the changes that are happening in English His is not the Panglossian attitude that all is necessarily for the best in the best of all possible languages but he does feel that change is necessary and healthy in any living language Howard here examines the language in its various branches and categories such as grammar and pronunciation spelling and punctuation dialect and slang He discusses the effect the new technologies from cable TV to photocomposition are having on the mother tongue and he examines the new dialects that are coming into use He navigates the back streets of euphemism and the broad boring boulevards of cliché He asks whether the language is actually changing as fast as we suppose and if so why Howard argues that as far as we can we should strive to direct and control the changes in English in ways that increase its power And where we can't help it he says we should lie back and enjoy its immense richness which is unrivaled by any other language Rather than have us wring our hands Philip Howard entreats us with his customary wit and erudition to use our tongues in concert with our brains About the Author Philip Howard is the author of New Words for Old Weasel Words Words Fail Me and most recently A Word in Your Ear South Australian, 1978 Index to Australian Book Reviews, 1974 Includes entries supplied by University of Queensland Library Staff Australian/New Zealand Literature in the Pennsylvania State University Libraries Nan Bowman Albinski, 1989 Australian Books, 1973
