

into pictures. They ought never to be adduced as evidence for anything. The value of the book, however, is not bound up with its specific thesis. Philo may not have taught a "mystery" in any technical sense, but he did teach a way of life, and in the thought of Philo we have the most significant expression of that Hellenistic mysticism which vitally affected Christianity. Dr. Goodenough has come nearer, we believe, than any previous writer to the inner meaning of Philo's message.

THE CELTIC CHURCH OF SCOTLAND

A STUDY OF ITS PENETRATION LINES AND ART RELATIONSHIPS

By W. DOUGLAS SIMPSON. Aberdeen: The University Press, 1935. 120 pages.

The author of this interesting study, in a previous work, The Historical St. Columba, (1927), argued from archaeological and documentary evidence that the origins of Christianity among the Picts are to be associated not with the renowned Irish saint, Columba, but with his less celebrated predecessor, the British missionary, Ninian, whose career ended about the time of Patrick's mission to Ireland (432). The present volume reasserts this thesis from a different approach. It is not a history of the Celtic Christianity of Scotland, but a study of the ways by which, and the persons through whom, Christianity came into existence in the Pictish area. The author sums up his argument by stating that the Christianization of Scotland was achieved "by Brythonic and Pictish emissaries from Candida Casa of St. Ninian, Bangor of the Irish Picts, Kingarth and Glasgow of the Britons, and their local daughter-houses, and not to any major extent by St. Columba and the Scotie Church of Iona."

It is disappointing to find that, amid much learned reference to authorities, Dr. Simpson does not mention the criticisms levelled against his St. Columba by J. A. Duke in The Columban Church (1931). Nor does he leave his position less vulnerable than before at the points on which Duke entered telling objections. Thus he reaffirms simpliciter (pp. 52f.) the "canon" that to the eighth century Celtic monastic and church foundations "bore always the name of the actual founder, or at all events of the founder of the parent monastery." This principle, highly useful as supporting the claim that Ninian dedications represent Ninian foundations, was challenged by Duke, who adduced three well-known instances of its violation. Simpson alleges in support, inter alia, a footnote in Haddan and Stubbs, which, on consultation, proves to refer primarily to Wales. Another defect seems to lie in a lack of caution in the use of late medieval authorities on early Scottish history. In particular, that entertaining writer, Hector Boece, first Principal of Aberdeen University, has a warm admirer in our author, now the University's librarian.

Dr. Simpson has, however, given us an attractive and at many points illuminating book. He is much at home in the field of Scottish archaeology, and has wrought into his reconstruction of the Christian mission in Scotland an imposing body of archaeological evidence. This feature gives a special value to the work, and appears, at least to a reader who has no
