

145 STOP STOMATITIS ASAP

Stomatitis is a big word to describe inflammation of your kitty's little mouth. It's pretty common, painful as heck, and potentially dangerous to your kitty's long-term health, so look out for any warning signs and do your cat a favor—get him to the vet as soon as possible.

If you see symptoms including:

- Pain, inflammation, or even bleeding gums.
- Bad breath (caused by inflamed tissues).
- Difficulty swallowing food and water.

Your cat may need long-term treatment to keep the symptoms at bay. Act quickly and you may prevent the inflammation from spreading or getting worse. Treatments include antibiotics, supplements, and tooth extractions.

146 TREAT RESPIRATORY DISEASES

Bacteria and viruses can cause nasty upper respiratory infections (URIs) in our cats. Cough, runny noses and eyes, nasal discharge, changes in appetite, and fever are common. "Get him to the vet!"

Respiratory viruses are contagious from cat to cat and have an incubation period of days to weeks. But, don't worry—most cats who have recovered from infections can escape carriers, and most transmit infections to other felines, long afterward.

Treatment involves antibiotics (and fluid therapy in some cases), plus plenty of TLC. This is where you can help your cat's recovery. Encourage her to eat, keep her warm, and wipe away any discharge from eyes and nose. Think she'll be on the road to health.

147 FIGHT URINARY TRACT ATTACKS!

Urinary tract issues are very common in cats. Your cat won't obviously complain about the discomfort in his bladder, so be sure to watch for any warning signs, to be urinating much more than usual, and continuing to try to pee while there is little to no urine come out? Maybe he's taking around his urinary area, as if trying to ease pain? Is he eating less, or acting sluggish, nervous, or otherwise off? When he urinates, do you see blood? Act immediately. If you suspect a urinary tract attack, don't wait to see if it gets worse. Be safe rather than sorry, and send your cat away to the vet for some relief. We will thank you! If your kitty experiences chronic urinary tract infections, there are supplements and special diets that can help to prevent flare-ups.
