Social Identity and Voting Behavior in a Deeply Divided Society: The Case of Israel

Rami Zeedan

Jewish Studies Program, The University of Kansas, Lawrence, KS 66045, USA; rzeedan@ku.edu

Abstract: This paper examines what best explains political behavior in a deeply divided society. Despite the democratic nature of the Israeli political system, we suggest that Israel's society is characterized by social affiliations mainly defined by social identity that include race, ethnicity, and religion and amount to tribalism. Based on the results of the 2020 election, we examined whether these social affiliations or other socioeconomic characteristics better explain voting behavior. First, we found a significant correlation between tribalism and voting behavior in Israel and socioeconomic characteristics and voting behavior in Israel. When comparing tribalism's correlation versus other socioeconomic characteristics, we found that the correlation between tribalism and voting behavior in Israel trumps the correlation between socioeconomic characteristics and voting behavior in Israel, except for the Ashkenazi Jews. In other words, voting behavior is better explained by affiliation to the social group, that is, by kinship, race, ethnicity, and religion, than by other socioeconomic characteristics such as education level, economic status, or geographic location. This extends the idea of "in-group favoritism".

Keywords: Israel; voting behavior; deeply divided society; tribalism; education; economy; kinship; race; religion; descriptive representation

1. Introduction

This study investigates the factors influencing voting behavior in deeply divided societies while focusing on social identity. Drawing from the social identity theory [1], our research explores the concept of "in-group favoritism", which refers to the tendency to favor members of one's in-group over out-group members [2]. This phenomenon can be observed across various social identities, such as work-related groups [3], immigration-related status [4], political parties [5], age [6], gender [7], nation [8], race [9], ethnicity [10], religion [11], culture [12], or geographic location [13]. Using the case of Israel, our study aims to understand how this "in-group favoritism" manifests in the context of voting behavior in a deeply divided society.

The connection between social affiliation and politics has already been mentioned concerning political coalitions [14] or political competition over resources and power [15]. Politics, in particular, elicits firm in-group commitments [16]. Political in-group favoritism can take the form of preferring to vote for an in-group candidate—hence, "identity voting" [17]. Such political in-group favoritism has been documented globally. Preferring to vote by race and gender affiliation was shown in the USA [18]. Voting by ethnicity was the primary determinant of the party vote in South Africa [19]. Religious belonging, behavior, and belief influenced voting behavior in Britain [20]. Preferring to vote by cultural similarities was documented in the parliamentary elections of the Basque Autonomous Community when language and Basque sentiment were found to have a significant correlation with voting [17]. The effect of geographical affiliation of the candidate on voting has been witnessed in Turkey, the USA, and Japan. In Turkey, favoring the local candidate was documented in legislative elections [21]. In the USA, an advantage has been shown for the "native son presidential candidate" [22]. In Japan, an advantage was suggested for constituency candidates [23].
