

Fig. 7-30 Bowen's theory for separating crystals from a magma. Settling of first-formed, high-temperature olivine crystals to the bottom of a magma chamber.

cooling magma, the remaining liquid would change to a more felsic and silica-rich composition. Bowen suggested that a natural separation of crystals from a melt would occur in a magma chamber (Fig. 7-30). Here, the progressively forming crystals could settle to the bottom and thus be removed from further reaction with the remaining molten liquid. It was suggested that in zones of mountain-building separation of crystals from a melt resulted from a process called "filter-pressing" (Fig. 7-31). Here, orogenic forces might compress the solid fraction of a slush into solid rock while driving out the remaining liquid to form silica-rich magma bodies—something like squeezing water out of a sponge.

If, as a basaltic magma solidifies, all crystals remain to react with the melt, the end product (as previously mentioned) is basalt. But if the minerals forming at high temperatures, such as olivine and sodium-plagioclase, are removed from reaction, they lock up much magnesium and calcium but little silica—thereby enriching the remaining liquid in sodium, potassium, iron, and silicon. These remaining elements combine into crystals of pyroxene, amphibole, and plagioclases having more sodium—minerals forming andesite or diorite. Should these andesite-forming minerals leave a melt before it completely hardens, the liquid residue would contain much silicon, potassium, and other elements

Fig. 7-31 Filter-pressing mechanism. Mountain-building forces compress a chamber of partially crystallized magma "slush," compacting the first formed ferromagnesian crystals into rock and driving out the still-molten fraction to create a magma of more felsic composition.
