

Free market economics or monetarism emerged in Britain and the United States strongly opposed to the use of aid and more favourable to trade as an instrument of development cooperation. The combined effect of Thatcherism in Great Britain and Reaganomics in the United States of America must have gone a long way to dilute the enthusiasm of the European Economic Community to maintain its original level of financial commitments to the ACP countries. The aftermath and eventual end of the Cold War provided a group of new candidates with considerable economic and social credentials for European economic support. In concrete terms central and Eastern Europe became more attractive and compelling candidates for EU development cooperation than the ACP countries. All these taken together contributed to the steady deterioration of ACP – EU cooperation (Wanauabe 2004). Gomus (2013), anchored this point in a recent article where he emphasized the changed environment of ACP – EU interactions by noting that the ACP – EU intervention is taking place in a world drastically different from the neo-colonial era of the 1970s; a situation he felt demands a reshaping of the asymmetrical partnership between the ACP and the EU.

This background provides a good foundation for a study of the provisions of the successive Lomé Conventions as evidence of the transition from a regime of multilateral cooperation for economic development to an instrument of political domination and dictation by the EU over the ACP countries:

LOMÉ I: The result of sincere bargaining and compromise contained three major innovations that constituted a real attempt to address ACP economic challenges. First the regime of reciprocal trade preferences between the European community and the associated states that prevailed under the Yaoundé Conventions was abolished and a system of unilateral preferences in favour of the ACP was instituted. A significant percentage of ACP products were granted free access to the European markets, and a series of measures to stimulate ACP trade were introduced.

Given the fluctuations and gyrations of the prices of raw materials and primary commodities in the world market, and their negative impact on the financial and budgetary stability of the ACP states, a new instrument was introduced to stabilize the export earnings of the ACP countries, called STABEX. In very simple terms, STABEX meant that those ACP countries whose export earnings from a number of specified commodities fell below a specific threshold calculated as a percentage of total export earnings for a year, could apply the European Community for a financial contribution to compensate for the loss in revenue. If conversely in good fields, the application of STABEX, was raised a controversy over the number of products left out; the adequacy of the financial resources made available for each of operations; and the slow process of disbursement of agreed sums.

Finally, as already indicated a chapter on Industrial Cooperation was included in the convention in response to the industrially advanced members of the ACP Group such as Nigeria. This provision which was considered very far reaching in its potential impact, however rapidly lost its value as the economic crisis which began in the late 1970s, deepened in the 1980s. As foreign exchange to pay for imported raw materials became more difficult to access, many of the factories that hurriedly set up had to shut down.

In addition to these three innovations contained in the first Lomé Convention, the two traditional elements of the regime of association namely financial and technical cooperation, as well as the provision for settlement and establishment between the two parties. One observer in particular turned out a very positive assessment of the Lomé Convention based on these provisions. In the view of the three innovative mechanisms introduced in Lomé I namely:

- i. The provision for industrial cooperation
- ii. The introduction of non-reciprocal trade preferences and
- iii. The export earnings stabilization fund STABEX, Cusack (1976)

Lomé II: The Beginning of the Decline.

Although Lomé II convention was eventually initiated in 1979 this was done in an atmosphere of either total disappointment or unfulfilled expectations on the part of the ACP group. The causes of disappointments were many, rather than expand, deepen and consolidate the three main instruments of improved access to ACP products in European markets; providing a robust financial envelope for STABEX and including more products under the coverage of STABEX, and improving on industrial cooperation, Lomé II introduced a system of financial support of mineral products that were formerly covered by STABEX, called SYSMEN. Although well mentioned SYSMEN did not witness a radical improvement in EU investment in ACP mines partly due to the fact the funds allocated to SYSMEN were sourced from part of the total cooperation envelope, but also due to the fact the long process of disbursement of agreed funds did not improve.

LOMÉ III: According to David (2000), the third Lomé Convention signed in 1984 had a total of 75 signatories 50 on the part of the European Union and 45 ACP states. The putative innovation introduced by this convention was the genesis of politicization of the cooperation by the “progressive abandonment of the project approach
