These results suggest that the effect of being a foreign-born immigrant on the likelihood of being a volunteer is mediated by a positive cultural orientation. Being from a country with a high level of volunteering involvement, as the United States, increases volunteer involvement, and the effect of this cultural shock is stronger among those from countries with lower volunteering involvement, as in the case of Mexico.

But is this Americanism (the century's acknowledged ideal) really enough to make a successful challenge to American imperialism? Many Americans have been convinced, unfortunately, that it is. Some have actually volunteered, but the countless articles and advertisements in support of their efforts in the name of Americanism are the least of their efforts in the challenge of the 1920s. While it is true that the United States has been a world leader in the development of the sciences and technology, the country's "frontiers" have been closed to the rest of the world. The United States has been the world's largest creditor, but it has not been able to open its markets to the rest of the world. The United States has been the world's largest producer of goods, but it has not been able to open its markets to the rest of the world.

There is a suggestion in the literature to the effect that the authors' intention to produce their country's first business ethics text was motivated by the fact that business ethics was not a subject in the curriculum of the business schools in the country. This is not the case in the United Kingdom, where business ethics has been a compulsory subject in the curriculum of business schools since the early 1990s. The authors' intention to produce their country's first business ethics text was motivated by the fact that business ethics was not a subject in the curriculum of the business schools in the country.
