

Rosen's chapters are not altogether alien to an account of the ritual process of becoming a physician in contemporary American society!

The concluding chapter, by Steven Rausser, is a tour de force in the personal document tradition of Kluckhohn and A. J. Levi. A study of the numerous revisions of Christopher Isherwood's autobiographical novel from Goodbye to Berlin (1939) through the new Capote (1972), it is simultaneously a study of how a culture remembers and forgets through its literary and cinematic traditions (screen memories). Like Thomas van Velsor, Rausser concludes that personal and social meanings are completely featured, that Gertrude not withstanding, text is not all. Methodologically, just as in the psychoanalytic study of a text, "The reader's response may be seen as an unconscious enactment of an organized fantasy embedded in the text" (p. 173), so likewise "the playwright correctly senses what the audience wishes and needs to see performed" (p. 174). "Through his early novel and the later novels and autobiographies, Isherwood has presented his efforts at working through a life situation. In his instance, universal conflict (the Oedipus) is brought into apposition with catastrophic trauma" (the death of his father in World War I, in conjunction with the loss of an entire generation of fathers and the wished/feared fulfillment of oedipal fantasy) (p. 195). Rausser elegantly and persuasively weaves personal history and culture history into a seamless psychodynamic fabric. It is a study in concealment and revelation, of modest revolt and latent submission, in life and art. Finally, it is a masterful illustration of the scholar's use of his or her own unconscious linking associations to discover connections between superficially disparate cultural materials.

In conclusion, Volume 12 is not only a worthy addition to the series, but it merits a wide reading as soundly addressing methodological and interpretive issues that are the essence of the social and behavioral sciences.

Halpern spent a month in 1936-37 with Southeastern Pennan people at attempting to uncover "historical events that might indicate some of the reasons
