Technology Against Terrorism: The Federal Effort ,1991 The United States has been a prime target of international terrorism for at least two decades In the 1980s several terrorist attacks had a particularly powerful effect in mobilizing public opinion and government action These were the bombings of the U S Embassy and of the U S Marine Barracks in Beirut in 1983 and the destruction of Pan American Flight 103 over Lockerbie Scotland in 1989 The Federal Government reacted in both cases by devoting more attention and resources to developing strategies and tools to defend U S lives and interests against such outrages Unless underlying causes are eliminated terrorist attacks will continue Since they may change in type and scope the United States must be prepared to deal with a wide range of eventualities The widespread availability of sophisticated weapons makes the challenge of counterterrorism all the more difficult In 1989 the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs the Senate Subcommittee on Terrorism Narcotics and International Operations of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the Senate Committee on Commerce Science and Transportation together with its Subcommittee on Aviation requested the Office of Technology Assessment to investigate the status of research on technological means to protect ourselves against terrorist threats A later endorsement of the study was received from the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence This report is the first of two in response to these requests A classified version was transmitted to Congress on September 24 1990 and an unclassified summary was released to the public separately on February 26 1991 It deals with the Federal research and development effort in countering terrorism and with the state of attempts to use technology to aid in detecting and preventing attempts to introduce explosives aboard aircraft A review of the relevant R D programs in many agencies is provided
