

The alchemical androgyne

Hermes Trismegistus, the legendary founder of alchemy, points to the primal mystery in nature, the principle of fire, which unfolds in its fourfold flames the two essential opposites, sun and moon, male and female, sulphur and mercury (right), which become the one androgyne at all moments of conception and birth in nature. They surround the earth (below), gathering into it the arial influences, and at its core combine in the form of a triangle (or rather, three-dimensionally, of a pyramid, which is the shape of a crystal of salt – both the male salts of the sea and the female alums of clay). The right side of the triangle symbolises the male sulphurous principle, its left side the female mercurial principle, and its base the principle of salt. The square and the circle hint at the squaring of the circle, which is a symbol for androgyne. The progression is therefore from the triangle to the square to the circle. Nature is one in all its three realms – the aerial, vegetable and animal, and mineral, worlds because in each one of them it is the same mating of the opposites that produces harmony, the same solar and lunar principles coming together. The mating can be visualised (opposite left) as a serpent (nature) with a lion's head (devouring fire and putrefaction) and a tail in the shape of an eagle's head (volatility) in the act of extracting from itself the invisible and impalpable moisture, by which the finest elements of the body are compacted together: in it lies the power of the sun and of the moon, which the serpent is shown squeezing through its coils (see also p. pp. 80–81).

The process is threefold. It starts with a first, embryonic androgyne phase, which in the case of mineral bodies takes place when in the bowels of the earth a nitrous, salty soil ☉ is impregnated with an acid, corrosive vapour ☿ and ☿ ☿; the two are gathered together by the principles of sunlight which enter the earth in the form of dew. The same dew that nourishes the life of plants can also activate this volatility beneath the earth. The result is called primal matter, or Rebus, or fiery androgyne (both principles being acid and burning), or Adam (because they are the first engendering principle in the mineral world). Isaac Newton preferred 'Chaos'. Paracelsus joked, calling it 'Tree-and-Apple' (opposite above) or 'Gall Pip' ☉ and 'Boy Pulp' ☿; the king and queen near the tree! The pulp will rot off, burn out in time, only to be remade out of the substance of the girl (the moon). The root of the process is often called the Poisonous Dragon. In the androgyne opposite below it is a cloud of goats' heads, with boy and girl uncoiling out of the goats' beards to curl up the two legs of the androgyne. We find the same symbolism of the goat in India, where the word as ('goat' in Sanskrit) can also mean 'unborn', and therefore nature (which below the earth is both ferid and ebullient).

Why not give this substance one name, and stick to it? This is not possible
