

Risk and Protective Factors for Alcohol and Other Drug Problems in Adolescence and Early Adulthood: Implications for Substance Abuse Prevention

J. David Hawkins, Richard F. Catalano, and Janet Y. Miller
Social Development Research Group, School of Social Work,
University of Washington

The authors suggest that the most promising route to effective strategies for the prevention of adolescent alcohol and other drug problems is through a risk-focused approach. This approach requires the identification of risk factors for drug abuse, identification of methods by which risk factors have been effectively addressed, and application of these methods to appropriate high-risk and general population samples in controlled studies. The authors review risk and protective factors for drug abuse, assess a number of approaches for drug abuse prevention potential with high-risk groups, and make recommendations for research and practice.

In spite of general decreases in the prevalence of the nonmedical use of most legal and illegal drugs in recent years, the abuse of alcohol and other drugs during adolescence and early adulthood remains a serious public health problem (Adams, Blanken, Ferguson, & Kopstein, 1990). The consequences of drug abuse are acute on both a personal and a societal level. For the developing young adult, drug and alcohol abuse undermines motivation, interferes with cognitive processes, contributes to debilitating mood disorders, and increases risk of accidental injury or death. For the society at large, adolescent substance abuse extracts a high cost in health care, educational failure, mental health services, drug and alcohol treatment, and juvenile crime.

Added to the immediate personal and social costs of adolescent drug abuse are the longer range implications for youngsters who continue to abuse alcohol and drugs into adult life. Drug abuse is involved in one third to one half of lung cancer and coronary heart disease cases in adults (R. Blum, 1987). Alcohol and other drugs are major factors in acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), violent crimes, child abuse and neglect, and unemployment. The problems associated with alcohol and other drug abuse carry costs in lost productivity, lost life, destruction of families, and a weakening of the bonds that hold the society together.

Given the serious consequences of drug and alcohol abuse, considerable effort has been directed toward identifying effective treatment. Until recently, applied research in the substance abuse field has consisted primarily of experimental trials of various forms of treatment for alcohol and other drug abuse. The goal has been to identify ways to increase the effectiveness of treatment and to prevent relapse following treatment. Strategies ranging from self-help to aversive counterconditioning have been advocated and assessed.

Many of these studies have demonstrated how abstinence can be achieved, but long-term maintenance of abstinence has been more difficult. The reinforcing properties of alcohol and other drugs are themselves often reinforced by norms and behaviors of family members and others in the communities in which recovering people live. These combined reinforcements often overcome short-term treatment gains. According to the surgeon general: "For many drug-dependent persons, achieving at least brief periods of drug abstinence is a readily achievable goal. Maintaining abstinence, or avoiding relapse, however, poses a much greater overall challenge" (Surgeon general, 1988, p. 311).

Added to disappointment with the staying power of drug treatment is a growing recognition of the high cost of treatment and of the inability of existing treatment programs to keep up with increasing demand. In recent years, these considerations have stimulated interest in primary prevention of alcohol and other drug abuse.

This article focuses on the prevention of alcohol and other drug abuse among adolescents. A number of views have been advanced about what constitutes substance abuse when considering adolescents (Hawkins, Lishner, & Catalano, 1985). In this article, adolescent drug abuse is defined as the frequent use of alcohol or other drugs during the teenage years or the use of alcohol or other drugs in a manner that is associated with problems and dysfunctions. This conception of the problem is not
