Abstract: COVID-19 had an impact on everyday life, especially during the lockdown. This also impacted higher education, leading to a sudden and complete shift to online e-learning. The purpose of this study was to develop, validate, and test a measurement tool suitable for evaluating students' e-learning experience among health and allied health professions students. The convenience sample consisted of 342 students. A validation of the instrument E-learning Experience Evaluation Scale (3E-Scale) was conducted before the study began. Factor structure, reliability, content, and face validity were assessed. Confirmatory factor analyses revealed a four-factor structure of the scale that explained 61% of the total variance. The overall scale demonstrated a high level of reliability and appears to be a reliable measurement tool. The results show that there are statistically significant differences between female and male students ( $p < 0.05$ ). In addition, nursing and dietetics students perceive more barriers related to the open-source learning management system than other students ( $p < 0.05$ ). Positive learning experiences contribute to greater learning satisfaction and, consequently, greater learning engagement. E-learning content design should be aligned with teaching pedagogy and learning outcomes. Future studies should also address the negative consequences of e-learning experiences.

1. Introduction

Over the past three decades, e-learning has come to be known by a variety of names, with “e-learning” apparently having caught on the most. E-learning is an umbrella term that encompasses various concepts and learning-related technologies such as distance, digital, electronic, online, and mobile learning [1–3]. While it includes and has interdisciplinary links with other disciplines and industries, e.g., computer engineering, information technology, design, and media studies, e-learning is basically a discipline of education [3,4]. While e-learning can effectively increase learners' knowledge and knowledge-related skills through a range of activities, it must be emphasised that e-learning is not superior to the traditional approaches. It is imperative that it be used with a solid understanding of learners' needs [3], which makes the process of education more student-centred, creative, and flexible [5,6].

Despite numerous definitions, e-learning is mostly defined as a form of online learning that uses ICT to present and distribute content as well as for interpersonal communication and interaction. In this definition, three elements distinguish e-learning from the traditional educational approaches: asynchronous delivery (absence of the time dimension), decentralisation (absence of the space dimension), and electronically mediated interaction or communication [7–10]. In this respect, the absence of space and time in e-learning significantly impacts the teacher–learner interaction, at least compared to traditional teaching forms. E-learning creates an entirely new social environment with the consequent need to
