ABSTRACT

The authors analyzed 30 countries in Sub-Saharan Africa over the period of 1996-2015 to investigate whether economic growth is sustainable, whether decreasing income inequality sustains growth, and whether economic growth alleviates or creates poverty due to decreasing or increasing income inequality, respectively. They found that growth in Sub-Saharan Africa is self-reinforcing in the sense that past levels of GDP per capita positively affect current levels of GDP per capita due to the strategic complementarity. Decrease in income inequality leads to growth due to increased consumption, higher investment in education, lower corruption, higher political stability, and more equal redistribution policies. Economic growth does not bring down income inequality in order to maximize social welfare. The authors conclude that growth is not sustainable in Sub-Saharan Africa since it only meets two of the three criteria.

INTRODUCTION

Although majority of the people living in high-income countries and some in the middle-income countries would enjoy unrivaled prosperity, a much larger number of the people living in low-income countries, especially in Sub-Saharan Africa, continue to live in extreme poverty. Although some developing countries are experiencing rapid economic growth and poverty alleviation, most authoritarian countries in Sub-Saharan Africa are struggling to implement Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) and market-oriented reforms amidst economic decline and increasing poverty (Tanzi and Chu, 1998).
