

Finding a Senior Thesis Topic for 2009-2010

Some senior thesis topics come from a student's previous research for a term paper or an experience in an internship. Other ideas come from subjects studied in a course or current headlines. But many students have difficulty coming up with a topic that "works"—one that is researchable by an Econ senior and where data are readily available. Below are research topics suggested by current faculty members in their own areas of expertise.

Chad Bown: International Trade

The proliferation of new trade restrictions in the global economic crisis. The current economic crisis has raised fears of a return to the protectionism of the 1930s, when the U.S. implemented the Smoot-Hawley tariff and other major countries retaliated with their own trade restrictions. The international economic environment is supposed to be different today. Introduction of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and its evolution into the current World Trade Organization (WTO) was supposed to prevent history from repeating itself—at least in this particular form. And yet there is increasing evidence that protectionism is returning.

A student could use the newly available Global Antidumping Database 5.0 (available summer 2009) to track the incidence of new import restrictions across the world. Which countries are using these policies to shut off access to imports? Are new restrictions having a significant trade-reducing effect? In what sectors? Are new restrictions being met with retaliation? In what ways is this different from the situation of the 1930s? In what ways is it similar?

Linda Bai: Environmental Economics

Environmental regulation and public health. California has some of the most stringent environmental regulations in the country and some of the worst measures of environmental quality. Yet very few studies look specifically at the relationship between environmental policy and health outcomes in California. Using publicly available pollution and health data (as well as regulatory information), a student can look for evidence of measurable health benefits from the extraordinary regulatory measures that California has undertaken for the past 30 years.

Laarni Bulan and Paroma Sanyal: Industrial Organization/Finance

Deregulation of the US electricity sector and corporate governance. A student could investigate the impact of deregulation on corporate board structures of electric utilities. Another topic would be to investigate whether interlocking directorships improves or hinders a firm's performance. Interlocking directors are directors who hold multiple board positions in different companies. The professors can provide relevant data.
