The Indirect Effect of Direct Legislation Frederick J Boehmke, 2021-01-29 Frederick J Boehmke's book makes explicit the many consequences intended and unintended of having direct legislation possible in a state. Many studies of the initiative process argue that it is a flawed process that rewards wealthy interests. While evidence to support this conclusion is often drawn from a number of high profile high expenditure initiative campaigns, ballot campaigns are merely one consequence of the initiative process. The ability to propose legislation directly to the people fundamentally changes the process through which citizens are represented by organized interest groups benefiting typically underrepresented interests. To demonstrate this, the author models the incentives that the initiative process creates for interests to organize and for how they communicate their preferences to policy makers. Interests that represent a broader range of the public are found to gain the most from the option to propose initiatives, implying that the set of organized interests in initiative states should reflect this advantage. Ironically, an effect of direct legislation is to potentially increase the effectiveness of special interest lobbying in state legislatures in a sense the opposite of the direct control that gives direct legislation its theoretical appeal. Yet the clear effect is one of empowering voices that traditionally had very little effect in the legislative process. If greater representation is the goal of direct legislation, it is a clear success even though that success does not really come in the act of ballot initiatives itself.

Dyck,Edward L. Lascher,2019-02-28 Arguments about the American ballot initiative process date back to the Progressive Era when processes allowing citizens to decide policy questions directly were established in about half of the states When political scientists began to systematically examine whether the state ballot initiative process had spillover consequences they found the initiative process had a positive impact on civic engagement Recent scholarship casts doubt on these conclusions determining the ballot initiative process did not make people believe they could influence the political process trust the government or be more knowledgeable about politics in general However in some circumstances it got them to show up at the polls and increased interest groups participation in the political arena In Initiatives without Engagement Dyck and Lascher develop and test a theory that can explain the evidence that the ballot initiative process fails to provide the civic
