Abstract: Trichinellosis remains a food-safety risk in Romania due to cultural traditions and food behavior. The aim of the present study was to evaluate the epidemiological, clinical and therapeutic data of all human trichinellosis cases in patients admitted to an Infectious Diseases Hospital from northwestern Romania during a thirty-year interval. Between 1 January 1988 and 31 December 2018, a total of 538 patients were hospitalized with the diagnosis of trichinellosis. The number of cases/year varied between 1 and 86. The source of infection was known for 524 patients, represented by domestic pig meat ( $n = 484$ ; 92.37%) and wild boar ( $n = 40$ ; 7.63%). Most patients (410; 73.48%) presented were part of family or group outbreaks. Demographical and clinical data of patients will be presented. Antiparasitic therapy was prescribed in 99.46% of cases, and corticosteroids were prescribed in 77.06% of patients. In total, 48 patients (8.6%) presented complications of trichinellosis: 44 for a single complication (neurological, cardiovascular or respiratory); the others multiple complications. Pregnancy was documented in five patients. No fatalities occurred during the study period. Although the number of hospitalized patients has decreased in the last years, trichinellosis still remains an important public health problem in northwestern Romania.

1. Introduction

Nematodes of the genus Trichinella are amongst the most widespread foodborne zoonotic pathogens, with infections having been diagnosed in numerous species of domestic and wild animals on all continents except for Antarctica [1]. According to the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) and World Health Organization (WHO), infection by Trichinella spiralis was classified as the seventh most important food-borne parasite of global concern [2]. Based on genetic studies, eight species and four additional genotypes have been recognized [3].

Contamination of the vertebrate host occurs by ingestion of meat infected with first-stage larvae (L1), which are released during gastric digestion and invade the small bowel mucosa [4]. As early as day 5 postinfection, the females begin releasing larvae, which migrate throughout the host's blood and lymphatic vessels, taking up residence in the striated muscle cells [4,5]. The larvae cause major perturbations of the host cells, where they encapsulate [6]. The survival of the larvae is variable, but it was noted that it can last for up to 40 years in humans [7].

Although Trichinella spp. are able to infect a large variety of vertebrate species, it is believed that only humans become clinically affected. The severity of the disease, however, is largely dependent on the number of ingested larvae and can range from asymptomatic to fatality [8]. Trichinellosis in humans is strictly related to cultural food practices,
