Thomas F. Best

Subsistence is organic church union as "endangered species"?

Participants at the Fifth International Conference of North and Central American Presbyterians (ICNA, July 1987) were alerted to David Paul H. Cross, Jr., comment that "organic union... has become something of an endangered species."¹ The present conference for the latest biennial survey of union negotiations is by no means an attempt to rescue union — that effort and, I believe, will be most profound and fruitful needed for visible church union. Yet some union participants do indeed call for very serious reflection upon the state of church union discussion today.

Before dealing with this question several important developments over the past two years must be mentioned. First, the Presbyterians' constitutions of union and union churches revealed a new breadth of vision within the movement. The constitutions reflected a challenging approach, bringing the traditional search for unity to questions of faith and order not dissimilar with a wider set of "life and work" issues; participation that put at least a few denominational differences, but that much more difficult issue of the proper participation of all the people of God in the life of the church; unity and witness, and the search for renewal in the life of the union and visiting churches. In addition, the constitutions featured a broad range of efforts towards unity, including both some traditional social efforts and programs and councils of churches which increasingly had begun converging programming for the search for church unity.

The constitutions papers and reports are essential reading for all those concerned with the life of the church today. They have been published in English² and widely distributed, most of the texts are available also in German.³ Further information is
