

Survey of Memphis, V: Kom Rabia: The New Kingdom Settlement (Levels II–V). By DAVID JEFFREYS, with contributions by B. DRISKELL and N. J. PRIERSON. Egypt Exploration Society Excavation Memoirs 79. Pp. x + 142, figs 34 in text, plans 6. London, Egypt Exploration Society, 2006. ISBN 0 85698 176 1. Price £55.

This book is the publication of the stratigraphic description and analysis of Levels II–V of the Egypt Exploration Society's excavations at Kom Rabia, Memphis which took place between 1984 and 1990. The excavations at Kom Rabia took place over six seasons, initially in an area of 500 square metres which revealed settlement remains of the Third Intermediate Period, as well as Ramesside and Late Eighteenth Dynasty occupation levels (Levels I–III). The excavation area was then drastically reduced to two 5 metre wide strips along the northern and western sides of the original 20 × 25 m square, which led to the discovery of early Eighteenth Dynasty and pre-New Kingdom levels (levels IV–VIII). The three earliest levels, VIII–VI were eventually buried beneath a mass of collapsed mud brick debris. This debris was then covered by a layer of sand (Level V) over one metre high in places. Following the publication of the preliminary survey,¹ and the publication of the objects from the highest levels,² this is the first volume to deal specifically with the archaeological interpretation of the site. In the meantime, it has been joined by D. Aston and D. Jeffreys, The Survey of Memphis, III: The Third Intermediate Period Levels (EES EM 81; London, 2007), which (p. 2) gives a detailed description of excavation, recovery, and recording techniques utilised in the 1984–1985 seasons, whilst the volume currently under review (p. 1) explains the modifications to these methods incorporated in the 1986–1988 and 1990 seasons.

The Survey of Memphis V comprises an introduction (pp. 1–3), a description, and analysis of the New Kingdom Levels II–V (pp. 5–36), a series of plans and sections of each of the baulks (pp. 37–46), a publication of the site matrices for Levels 0–V (pp. 47–65), a reconstruction of events for levels II and III (p. 67), a preliminary analysis of the finds and architecture (pp. 69–78), and, finally, a listing of site units, deposits, and contexts (pp. 79–111), a listing of finds and site units (pp. 113–34), as well as a summary and preliminary evaluation of the site (pp. 137–8).

Somewhat unusually, the archaeological analysis is arranged from latest to earliest so it is rather hard to follow the development of individual buildings, and one wonders why this approach was taken. This review, however, will proceed in the normal chronological order, as indeed was done in the introduction to Lisa Giddy's New Kingdom and post New-Kingdom objects volume,³ hence the earliest levels discussed in this review are Levels IV and V. However, owing to the very small areas excavated, both these levels appear somewhat problematic. Level V (pp. 30–6, plan 6), essentially a level of sand deposits, begins with context ('deposit') RAT 782 which represents the collapse and erosion detritus of the latest standing architecture of Level VI (not discussed in this book as it precedes the New Kingdom) and ends with RAT 289, the top of which shows clear evidence of having been levelled, presumably for the foundations of Level IV. The interpretation of Level V (p. 34) states that 'the oldest sand covering almost certainly postdates, or is contemporary with, the later Second Intermediate Period'. This is indeed consistent with the statement (p. 36) that the ceramic content of the 562–836 sequence, the lowest of which is firmly placed in Level V in the matrix on p. 60, 'strongly suggests a New Kingdom deposition if not origin'. According to the profile, section 2 on p. 44, this sequence directly overlies level VI. Both the quoted statements lead to the clear view that 782 should be contemporary with, or later than, the later Second Intermediate Period, whilst everything above
