

Millions of people participate each year by telephone, by mail, or in person in surveys conducted by polling organizations, political parties, mass media, market research firms, and so on. Their answers provide vast knowledge about social life in contemporary society. The principal purpose of this book, written to honor Herbert Hyman, internationally respected sociologist and pioneer in survey research, is to demonstrate and assess the remarkable effectiveness of these research techniques.

Essays by survey-line noted social scientists, among them Robert K. Merton, Robin M. Williams, Charles Y. Glock, James S. Coleman, Harriet Zuckerman, Sigmond Diamond, Christian Ben, Elizabeth Noelle-Newmann, Howard Schuman, and Morris Rosenberg, discuss a wide range of applied and general social problems. Some of the practical questions concern popular fears of nuclear energy, fraud among scientists, the status of American blacks, the treatment of medical findings in reports by the press, and the role of the FBI in survey research. Some of the theoretical issues addressed include formation of public opinion, pluralistic ignorance, reward systems, and social deviance. The book is divided into six parts: Survey Research, Reference Groups, Social Psychology, Public Opinion, Inequality, and Mass Media.

An introductory essay by Hubert O'Gorman evaluates the life and work of Herbert Hyman.

Surveying Social Life is a searching investigation of important political, moral, and social questions and of the contributions of social science to the understanding of human social behavior.
