Introduction: Fluids

Fluids can be defined as any substance which is capable of flowing.

They don't have any shape of their own.

For example:-water which does not have its own shape but it takes the shape of the container in which it is poured.

Both liquids and gases can be categorized as fluids as they are capable of flowing.

Volume of solids, liquids and gas depends on the stress or pressure acting on it.

In this chapter we will study if we apply force on the fluid how does it affects the internal properties of fluids.

Fluids offer very little resistance to shear stress.

We will also study some characteristic properties of fluids.

Pressure in Fluids:-

Normal force exerted by fluid per unit area.

This means force is acting perpendicular to the surface of contact.

Consider a body submerged in the water, force is exerted by the water perpendicular to the surface of the body.

If there is no force applied perpendicularly but in the parallel direction then there will be motion along the horizontal direction.

Since fluid is at rest and body is submerged in the fluid. Therefore there cannot be motion along the horizontal direction.
