SAID at the end of the last chapter that Athena alone of all the City States of antiquityJ solved for a time the problem of freely developing the talent of the individual while maintaining fully that identification of the individual with the State which was the very essence of Greek social life j This proposition I wish to prove and explain in the present chapter By keeping steadily to it we shall obtain I believe the best idea of such good life as it was possible for the City State to realise and we shall learn to identify that good life with the form and spirit of Democracy the last phase taken by this kind of social union in the course of its natural development before decay set in I say the form and spirit of Democracy for though Democracy is often treated as a form of government only 1 we surely may not be content so to treat it if we are really bent on understanding what the TToTu in its perfection could do for the education of mankind 1 E g by Sir H Maine in Popular Government oh i Let us start by taking as a text some memorable words of the statesman who above all other Athenians in the golden days of Athens perceived what the State might do for the individual and the individual for the State towards the realisation of the good life When Athens at last became involved in war with Sparta at the funeral of the DEGREES first victims of battle Pericles was chosen to deliver V an oration over them of which Thucydides the historian himself doubtless among the audience has preserved for us the spirit and the thoughts in his own weighty and subtle phraseology One passage in this immortal speech seems to embody in living words the statesman s idea of The City-state of the Greeks and Romans William Warde
