Lewis, Sherman Robinson, 1996 Trade Liberalisation, Economic Growth and Environmental Externalities Hansa Jain, 2016-12-20 The book examines the trade liberalization measures which were initiated in India during 1991 and which focused on manufacturing industries This industry was considered because of its strong inter sectoral links and its capacity to stimulate the growth of other sectors The resulting liberal trade policies involving a reduction in trade barriers and inflows of FDI capital and technologies were adopted to increase the manufacturing output However these measures were most beneficial to those industries whose products have greater demand in developed countries Against this backdrop the book breaks down the overall effect of trade induced manufacturing growth into scale composition and technique effects to discuss the impact on environmental externality In addition to manufacturing activity it also investigates the effect of other factors that improve with economic growth and examines the extent to which India's trade led economic growth allows production activities to move to cleaner technologies and whether India has achieved its economic growth by specializing in pollution intensive low technology industries The book also estimates the impact of these environmental externalities on society's wellbeing Measuring the Impact of Distortions in Agricultural Trade in Partial and General Equilibrium Mr. Stephen Tokarick, 2003-05-01 This paper provides quantitative estimates of the impact of removing agricultural support both tariffs and subsidies in partial and general equilibrium frameworks The results show that agricultural support in industrial countries is highly distortionary and tariffs have a larger distortionary impact than subsidies Removal of agricultural support would likely raise the international prices of food resulting in an increase in the cost of food for many net food importing countries although the increase is generally small The results also show that most of the benefits from removing agricultural support accrue to the countries that liberalize Global Rice and Agricultural Trade Liberalisation Mohammad A. Towards Free Trade in Agriculture Kirit S. Parikh, Günther Fischer, Klaus Froberg, Odd Gulbrandsen, 2013-06-29 Agriculture seems to be a difficult sector to manage for most governments Developing countries face tough dilemmas in deciding on appropriate price policies to stimulate food production and maintain stable preferably low prices for poor consumers Governments in developed countries face similar difficult decisions They are called upon to give income guarantees to farmers whose incomes are unstable and relatively low when compared to those in the nonagricultural sector These guarantees often lead to ever increasing budgetary outlays and unwanted agricultural surpluses High prices make new investments and the application of new technologies more attractive than world prices warrant and a process is set in motion where technological innovation attains momentum of its own in turn requiring price policies that maintain their rates of return Surpluses are disposed of with subsidies in domestic markets or in the international market Price competition reduces the market share of other exporters who may be efficient producers unless they are willing to engage in subsidy competition This lowers export earnings and farm incomes or depletes the public resources of developing countries that export competing products Retaliatory measures have led to frictions and further distortions of world prices Every so often the major agricultural exporters the USA the EC Australia or Canada accuse one another of unfair intervention Though they have agreed to discuss agricultural trade liberalization under GATT negotiations if anything the expenditure on farm support has continued to increase in both the EC and the USA
