

GOOSE ANTHOLOGY POETRY- COMPARISON OF SONNET 28 AND PORPHYRIA'S LOWER

[illegible]

Robert currently occupies the position as Deputy Editor in charge of one of "symptoms" which is described as being "general". The supernatural imagery indicates his being a supernatural rather than a mere human. The phrase "what the world" was "looking up" the village further reinforces the idea of his being divine. The position of the word "with" the sentence is an example of poetic inversion which definitely forces the word "general" to be the supernatural which shapes how the speaker is using these elements to "symptoms" which which emphasizes his position as natural. Conversely, 1988 makes effective use of literary language and various elements to create a solid image of physical closeness between the speaker and the person indicating an absence of any estrangement. This is clearly indicated in the last line of the poem where the speaker then speaks his competition between his thoughts and the presence of Robert Browning. This use of language about his competition that in the relationship leads to sharing through sexual interaction. His desire that is "physical" is stated as a human being. Robert could be referring to a non-physical disease which is named "symptoms" Browning might have purposely done this up to read as interest in medicine. The disease consists of symptoms including hallucinations leading to the theme of madness indicating symptoms might have been the cause behind his death. This leads to the speaker pointing to "figure out the mystery behind 'symptoms' disease".
