though every one sings it and since violence is learned tells us that tolerance is no longer available is replaced by trauma Although nothing in the poems not even such affirmations of aesthetic transport as Constant Craving which speaks of music that acts as axis to steady everything around makes one identify the poet as a bright eyed optimist various moments in the work display too much respect for the complexity of cause and effect limitations of human perception the transience of trends and sudden appearances of the unexpected to place sustained credence in large generalizations and foregone conclusions from the Introduction by Thomas Fink
