

Workplace Law

The changing nature of workplace law over time

Workplace law regulates the relationship between employees and employers, ensuring the rights of workers are protected.

- In medieval times there was a feudal system with no recognition of workers rights.
- As a result of the industrial revolution people were required as a labour force for the new factories being built.
- During this period the conditions of employment were harsh, the hours long and the work was often dangerous.
- The doctrine of laissez-faire is that employees and employers should be free to make whatever arrangements they wish without government control. Laissez-faire allowed poor conditions to exist because the government did not intervene.

Tolpuddle martyrs was the first attempt of a trade union. The tolpuddle were sent to Australia as convicts where they then brought these ideas to Australia.

- A number of Factory Acts 1833 were passed to regulate conditions of workers, marking a departure from the doctrine of laissez-faire.
- Trade unions began to form and social and community pressures meant that it was no longer accepted that a contract of employment was a bargain between two equal parties.
- From that time the government began to interfere and regulate to promote the welfare of the people.
- Collective bargaining was eventually recognised and the workers' representatives, the trade union, were bargaining with the employers for improved pay and conditions.
- As an outcome of society's recognition of the injustice of the industrial revolution towards the working class, people demanded change.
- As the society evolves the law follows in its wake.
- Consequently, workers' compensation legislation was introduced to make the industry carry the cost of accidents for injured workers (first OHS Law)

James V Price 1773: Lord Mansfield said "the more we look into law, the more it appears founded on equity, reason and good sense"

- Over the 19th and 20th century has been an enormous expansion of the role of Government for the greater good of community. There has been in the late 20th and 21st centuries a turning back of the role of government.
- There is now a view that the government must withdraw from some areas and allow individuals to make decisions without regulation.
