Abstract – Corrosion is one of the most common naturally occurring processes studied by thermodynamics, which includes oxidation process, metal disruption, and its chemical and electrochemical effects under environmental influence. Corrosion of metal and equipment accounts for a considerable proportion of total corrosion losses, thus providing the impetus for further investigation and developments related to corrosion protection in order to provide transport systems and industry with corrosion preventive materials and tools.

Keywords – Corrosion, maritime transport, metal coatings, wear.

I. INTRODUCTION

Protection of metals from corrosion is a topical issue affecting all areas of the world's economy. The losses due to the damage associated with marine transport corrosion during the period of construction or operation constitute approx. 50–80 billion USD and approx. 3 % of world GDP [1]. Statistics show that 90% of ship failures are attributed to corrosion [2].

The effects of corrosion are diverse. First, these are irreversible metal losses (When corrosion is widespread and uniform, with steel in seawater a metal loss of about 0.3 mm per year may be expected [3]). The main losses are related to indirect losses – increase in the mass of metal structures due to corrosion enhancements, increase in the amount of works related to construction manufacturing, reduction of their performance, large volume of repairs, etc.

Experience shows that the proper design of ship structures and use of corrosion protection equipment, qualified operation and timely replacement of damaged structures can reduce the damage caused by corrosion by 33 % of this cost could be prevented by the selection and use of an appropriate corrosion protection system [4]. To reduce the metal capacity of ships by reducing the thickness of structures, increasing the carrying capacity and life of ships.

The diversity of vessel structures and operating conditions create certain difficulties in the design and use of methods and tools for corrosion protection. The most effective way to prevent corrosion is by using various methods of protection.

II. INFLUENCE OF THE MARINE ENVIRONMENT

A ship's hull and structures are exposed to the effects of liquid and gaseous corrosion environment (permanent and periodic) [5], [6].

Sea, river and lake water, atmospheric air as well as various gases represent corrosive environments for vessels and other marine constructions.

Seawater means all ocean waters varying in their salinity and chemical composition. Salinity S – the total amount of minerals, g, per 1 kg of water – is expressed in per mille and is from 2 ‰ to 40 ‰. The average sea and ocean salinity is 35 ‰. The relationship between the concentrations of the main ions of 99.9 % of substance dissolved in the seawater is constant [7], [8]. The exception is closed seas, the Baltic Sea, the Azores Sea, the Caspian Sea, etc., with different ratios. To assess the aggressiveness of environmental corrosion, the ion concentration in the given area is determined by salinity data. For example, in the Baltic Sea the salinity of water in the upper layers ranges from
