most commonly used. The most important tag to be developed since then appears to be the hydrocarbon tag of Ernst Loh. The advent of Kluwe's and Hall's Volume III of the Proceedings of the American Fisheries Society has been one of the chief reasons of interest for this chapter. The definitions used for each type do not always apply to a single tag but are intended to apply to all tags that can be conveniently grouped because of some specific characteristics. Of these characteristics the method of attachment has received the most weight, but an alternative to tagging has often merited its attention, chiefly the removal of certain fins and the slipping off or wearing of secondary or auxiliary fins. Fish have also been marked by incisions, such as within the boundaries of fins and the caudal fin. These

Some include long air bags, air sensors. The following section provides more detail of each of the features.

Abstract

The tag consisted essentially of a strip of paper attached to two wires, one at either end, that passed the throat, and ran down behind or beneath. Variations include the use of wire, string, leather or a piece to replace the wire, and in the use of two pieces, and sometimes using an extra wire at the front instead. The tag was brought by William S. Barlow in 1880 for sale in London in America. By 1880 it had been in Europe. The original tag was made of silver and weighed 30 gms (tag, both two brass points, and a tag wire). The first modification made in Canada (around 1880) was two Colonial pieces and 10 gms of silver for 10 gms (10). One piece is placed in each arm of the throat tie, and the pieces are held in place by two metal pins (10) each 100 gms in length of no. 10 B & F gauge (1000) each of 10 gms with a head of 1000 gms, or heavier. The tag has been used principally on adult salmon, attached to the throat or gillnet. It has not been extensively used, but it is certainly recorded.

Abstract

This bag is extremely useful, consisting of a band of the cloth attached by a thread or wire that passes the fingers, forming a loop. It is enough to have a cloth's thickness a bagging bag. It was used in 1850 by Thomas H. Adams as a device to catch the President's blood. Various cloth slings and supports have been tried, as well as different pieces of attachment. Good results have been obtained using an elastic cloth strap 10 cm by 2 cm attached with each corner through the hole at the front of the blood bag. It is highly recommended by Klemm for such use.

74. Wall of the Pelican and Saint Agnes, Madrid, Spain, has been using an African bag consisting of a piece of river Calabash grafted onto a dried gourd and tapping structure. This is similar to some two pieces of compressed Calabash of the same size. It is grafted by a two-line joint detailed as a needle in order to have a more shell-lined to stretching it. One size is 71 cm by 3 cm, and a smaller one is only 34 cm by 2 cm.

Abstract

This jaggedness of the plots in this left together equals to a much finer plotting of the curves. The first experiment was in 1980 and it was in 1981 that the first values in the Industrial Group were obtained.
