

Micro computers In the Classroom: Educational technology of Social Practice?

A one-year study was conducted to see how Microcomputers would affect the classroom. Four teachers from San Diego, all with various computer skills, were given microcomputers, curriculum and software to use. Their classrooms were observed three times a week throughout the year long study. There were two different predictions made on the affects of using microcomputers in the classroom.

1. The technology would cause changes in the social organization of a classroom.
2. Schools will reject computer innovations assuming that social organization determines technology use.
