

Synthetic zeolites

> Desiccation (dehydration and rehydration)

Zeolites can be used as desiccation drying agent, due to its high porosity they can hold water and water present in the pores can be evaporated without damaging its structure.

Zeolite A is used as water softener in the detergents.

Zeolite A is also used as drying agent for air, natural gas and organic solvent.

> Ion exchanger

The cations present in the cavities can be exchanged with other cations. When in aqueous conditions, hydrated cations within the zeolite pores are easily exchangeable with other cations because they are weakly attached to the zeolite framework.

Applications of this include the use of zeolites in detergents and soaps as well as water softening equipment. Zeolites can be used as detergents. Zeolites are used extensively in detergent formulations as water softening agents in place of phosphates. They achieve this by trading the calcium and magnesium in the water for the sodium in the zeolite. Even radioactive ions in tainted water can be eliminated.

Zeolites are extremely effective for the exchange of ions due to their cage-like structure. As an illustration, hard water is run through a column of sodium-containing zeolites. Zeolites are used in this technique to retain calcium and magnesium while releasing sodium ions, softening the water and making it sodium-rich. Today, zeolites are also utilized in detergent to remove calcium and magnesium, softening the water and enhancing the detergent's efficacy. Act as cation exchangers. Cation exchanger capacity in the hard water can be exchanged by Na^+ of sodium.

Order of strength of adsorption of cations is

Ion exchange zeolite helpful in hard water softening. Calcium and magnesium present in the hard water can be exchanged by Na^+ of sodium zeolites.

> Agriculture

The synthetic zeolites control the release of fertilizers in agriculture lands. The loss of nitrogen can be reduced by zeolites. Release of phosphorus from phosphatic fertilizers can be controlled by adding ammonium zeolites to the phosphatic fertilizers such as apatite, calcium phosphate etc. Zeolites from Cuba and Japan have a long history of application in agriculture in Eastern Europe. When added to cattle rations, ammonia and odor emissions are reduced, feed utilization is increased, mycotoxin absorption is aided, and trace elements may be added at a rate of about 5%. NASA used nutrient-loaded zeolites as slow-release fertilizers a number of years ago.

Zeolites are also used in crop production, environmental protection, waste water treatment, resource conservation and soil structural benefits.
