

HOW IT COMPANIES COMPETE

By: Branda, Dan., Canadian Business Review, Spring95, Vol. 22 Issue 1, p20, 4p, 2 diagrams

INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY COMPANIES ARE USING INTERNAL AND EXTERNAL STRATEGIES TO BOOST THEIR COMPETITIVENESS

Information technology (IT) companies worldwide understand that their share of any product category or service might evaporate overnight. They accept that today's array of products and services could become obsolete and therefore unprofitable tomorrow. Product life cycles for everything from CPUs to storage capacity are measured in months, not years. To compete effectively, next year's solutions must be on the drawing board today.

Another cold reality: The products and services that drive the information highway no longer generate the same returns they did just a few years ago. Profit margins seem to be shrinking almost as fast as the products themselves evolve, and to compete effectively, IT companies must merchandise to global markets. These new business imperatives have led to a rethinking of how IT companies compete, especially in the Canadian context.

Hewlett-Packard Canada has developed a strategic outlook that maximizes its competitive advantage in the face of these new business imperatives. The first element of the company's strategy, embodied in its Centres of Excellence Program, addresses the need to compete within the organization itself for the global production mandates that dictate the company's long-term success. The second element focuses on enhancing the shift towards "co-opetition," a term coined by Ray Noorda, Chief Executive Officer, Novell Inc. Co-opetition is characterized by the constantly changing alliances and partnerships within the IT sector whereby companies challenge each other for business opportunities while at the same time collaborating on the development of specific projects, products and services.

CENTRES OF EXCELLENCE PROGRAM

Given that the Canadian market accounts for less than 5 per cent of its revenue, Hewlett-Packard Canada, as is the case with most transnational companies in the IT sector, must win global mandates for its products and services.

The company has chosen to focus on the telecommunications and networking subsectors in order to take advantage of the critical mass that exists in Canada in terms of skills training capacity, R&D expertise, and component production and assembly. Canadian universities such as Waterloo and Ecole Polytechnique produce outstanding engineers; Hewlett-Packard's Canadian competitors--the IBMs, Northern Telecoms, Mitels and Newbridges--are potential sources of technical and component support (see Exhibit 1).

In order to win global mandates in the telecommunications and networking subsectors, Hewlett-Packard Canada competes internally with its sister sites in other countries. To make its case for any product or service, the company must clearly demonstrate that its products are worthy of a global mandate, that an infrastructure exists to support R&D, and that the company has access to a world-class supplier chain during the production stages of its products' life cycles.

The Centres of Excellence Program exists as a strategic overlay to Hewlett-Packard Canada's internal planning, production and marketing programs. Centres of Excellence targets senior managers within the global organization who have the power to award global production mandates. Its purpose is to ensure that decision makers at the company's corporate headquarters, as well as those based at centres around the world, are fully aware of the competitive opportunities for product and service development that exist in Canada. Simply put, Centres of Excellence advances the notion that for certain defined activities, Canada is the best place in the world for Hewlett-Packard to do the job.

In this context, the Centres of Excellence Program identifies new opportunities in product engineering, joint ventures and strategic acquisitions and assigns internal benefits to each. The benefits include new revenue streams, the creation of high-value-added jobs, market share and export growth, and the establishment of new global product mandates. The program stresses the added value of Canada's strong infrastructure, with its cost-effective, knowledge-based resources, and the equally important presence of advanced supplier chains.

THE INNOVATION-PRODUCTIVITY EQUATION

It would be difficult if not impossible for Hewlett-Packard Canada to win and hold global production mandates if it did not have a well-developed internal strategy for maximizing innovation and productivity--a strategy that is responsive to the changes occurring within the IT sector, both in Canada and around the world. The development of this element of the company's strategic outlook is predicated on four conditions.
