

The Churches of Africa: Future Prospects

Edited by Claude Geffre and Bertrand Luneau

New York, Concilium, Seabury Press, 1977. 120 pp. $4.95.

In an introductory editorial, the editors of this volume point out that the Catholic churches of Africa represent more than forty million members. "These are churches which for the most part have their own African hierarchies and possess a moral authority which often exceeds the numerical importance of the community . . . [but] it is not certain that they will mature to the status of unique and irreplaceable members of the Church of Jesus Christ." In a series of nine essays written by Africans and ex-patriates, by bishops and priests, the editors attempt to discover a reason for the uncertainty of the future of the Catholic Church in Africa.

The writers are Roman Catholic, and they write about problems in the Catholic Church. Yet it is clear that their basic concern is the same as that facing the Protestant churches of Africa. While Protestants may have handled certain aspects of the problem more positively, other aspects have been creatively handled by the Catholic Church. But the concern is common to all Christian churches: Can the churches of Africa break through the imposed theology of western missions, a product of western culture and hellenistic philosophy, while maintaining faithfulness to the gospel of Jesus Christ?

The writers tackle the central theme from various perspectives: the historic, pastoral, theological, cultural, the laity, and the local church. This theme might be stated as a question: Can the Roman Church become the universal church? The answer to this question may significantly affect the church in Africa.

After a hundred years of evangelization, ex-patriates still represent the majority of the clergy. In Zaire, for instance, with a Catholic population of over nine million, there are 675 Zairois clergy and some 2,500 ex-patriate missionary clergy. Yet when the regional Conference of the bishops of Central Africa and Cameroun drew up a motion in favor of a clergy to include married men and submitted it to the 1971 Synod of Rome, "Thunder began to rumble down from the heights of Olympus and it became advisable to put these desiderata in low profile."

At the same time there is a tendency to conserve and preserve "received formulae and institutions" that work in favor of the status quo. The word "service" has been introduced as a means of further justifying missionary presence. Thus the practice of missionary days places the young churches inside a vicious circle, which both works from and tends toward a white ideal.

It is no wonder that some leaders call for "the orderly departure of missionaries from Africa." Others follow the Call for a Moratorium of the All-Africa Conference of Churches. African bishops, however, have
