The Colonial Office in the Early Nineteenth Century Douglas MacMurray Young, 1961 In the early years of the nineteenth century the organisation of the offices in Downing Street and Whitehall failed at first to keep pace with the expansion and reorganisation of the Empire It is the author's aim to assess how far the limitations of these offices restricted statesmen in their framing and carrying out of colonial policy and to describe the alterations that were eventually made in the administrative system to accommodate the colonial expansion In 1801 the Secretary of State for War became responsible for the Colonies and when in 1815 his war duties came virtually to an end it was already obvious that the affairs of the overseas Empire required the attention of a competent minister at the head of an organized department In the fifteen years that followed the Colonial Office underwent a two fold change Internally it was enlarged and increased responsibility was given to the permanent staff Externally Treasury financial control became both effective and far reaching The narrative is centred on the Downing Street Office and the men who ran it Political events at home and overseas are discussed only where they impinged directly on the daily routine of the Office The key figure in the formative period was the genial and shrewd Earl Bathurst the Secretary of State for the Colonies from 1812 to 1827 though the actual impetus for change came chiefly from his Under Secretary R J Wilmot Horton Horton had the good sense to surround himself with able men to whom he gave responsibility and the ensuing transformation of senior clerks into responsible advisers initiated an important administrative reform subsequently adopted by other government departments This is the first comprehensive survey of any government department for the period before the days of typewriters carbon paper and filing systems and should be of value to all historians particularly to those working on the Empire and Commonwealth or interested in the evolution of the Civil Service
