Stock Markets And Financial Journalism:

News Media and the Stock Market: Assessing Mutual Relationships Nadine Strauß, 2018 This dissertation provides insights in explaining the interrelationships between news media and the stock market First the results show that first hand economic news seems to induce stronger and more immediate stock market reactions than already known public information Second public economic news appears to be related to smaller and more delayed stock market reactions Third daily news coverage about stocks seems to lag behind too much to be able to drive stock prices Fourth public corporate communication was found to affect intraday stock market reactions e g quarterly earnings new product while at the same time market expectations appear to play a crucial role in how financial news gets interpreted and acted upon by market participants as well Fifth with regard to news characteristics negative emotions and negative sentiment have been found to induce a downward trend in the stock prices while relevant news and expert opinions seem to drive the stock market prices up In addition corporate news dealing with IPOs was seen to relate to the flotation performance of IPOs Lastly while social media have been identified to provide relevant financial information for the financial markets the financial information system itself was found to be self constitutive and self referential In line with this a tendency of speculative reporting or simply follow up reporting seems to have become common practice in online financial news In this vein this dissertation has made a crucial contribution to the field of financial communication but also to related disciplines such as finance or economics Samenvatting auteur
