

Psychopathology and Substance Abuse: What Is Being Learned from Research in Therapeutic Communities

The pervasive use of drugs in the general population and the clearly established relationship between drug abuse and psychological disorder emphasizes the importance of diagnoses and treatment in both the mental health and the drug abuse service systems. Therapeutic community (TC) research findings on psychopathology are highlighted on the prevalence, trends, and impact of treatment, which indicate that TCs have evolved a potent model for modifying drug abuse behavior and reducing psychological symptoms. Although its success has been most evident with the primary substance abuser, the TC has much to offer the increasing numbers of dually diagnosed individuals who manifest their dysfunctionality both through drug abuse and psychological maladjustment.

The enculturation of the general population to drug use is reflected in a widening spectrum of individuals seeking admission to treatment for substance abuse problems. In particular, crack cocaine abuse has supplanted opioids as the main illicit drug abuse problem. In addition, there are significant increases in adolescents and females seeking treatment. Drug use at all levels of society has catalyzed a proliferation of treatment services in both the private and public sectors. Perhaps most evident is the range of psychological problems observed among admissions to all drug abuse treatment modalities.

Since its development in the early 1960's, studies of the therapeutic community (TC) treatment modality have yielded a substantial clinical and research literature concerning psychopathology among drug abusers. Indeed, the rehabilitative approach employed in most traditional TCs has been guided by its perspective of drug abuse as a whole person disorder, encompassing problems in all areas of psychosocial functioning (De Leon 1986). Nevertheless, relatively little of this literature is known among workers both within and outside of the chemical dependency field.

The present article briefly surveys the research on psychopathology among substance abusers in TCs, with a focus on the themes of psychological profiles, impact of treatment, current trends, and implications for treatment and research. In this broad overview of psychopathology in TCs, some specific limits and caveats should be underscored. First, the literature surveyed is not exhaustive and is confined mainly to studies of traditional TCs in North America, although exceptions are noted. Nor is it a critical review of the research undertaken in terms of design or methodological issues. These efforts may be found elsewhere (e.g., Jainchill 1989; Holland 1986).

Second, emphasis is placed on conclusions, supported by key findings; details of design or data are minimal, although illustrative figures are included. Third, methods of assessment of psychopathology vary, including case histories, clinical/psychiatric interviews, and standard test instruments. The findings reviewed are primarily from studies using the latter. While these may be less sensitive than other methods, they are psychometrically sound, are replicable in research designs, and generally do not contradict clinical conclusions.

Finally, much of this work has been completed in specific treatment programs, limiting generalization to all TCs or other treatment modalities. Nevertheless, the consis-
