

SKI TESTS 17 SKI BRANDS

...the ski test ever conducted reveals guidelines you should know before you buy
BY JANET NELSON

Testing a ski is probably the single most difficult sports equipment evaluation—in much depends on the whims of the tester, his body build, his physical abilities, the way his coffee tasted that morning, to say nothing of the vagaries of the terrain, snow and weather conditions and the demands made upon the ski. This is why I've asked over 100 ski instructors to report their impressions of 17 brands of ski (more than 17 models after a season or more of use).

For each ski they owned, the instructor filled out a four-page detailed questionnaire. In all, they put 103 skis through specific performance tests measuring factors like ease of turning, accuracy of carving, tracking ability, turning in deep snow, consistency in bumps, quickness of response. They also rated the ski's abilities in performing at all levels from steep slopes through edge-sets on steep slopes.

Of course, the thing that makes this type of test most valuable is the measurement of durability. It's good if instructors put thousands of hours and miles on their skis. They confirmed that unexpectedly, the used skis maintain center and tip longer and are, in general, more durable. However, some of the high-cost fiberglass skis deteriorated well in this area.

Interestingly enough, the instructors who got the two all-around performance from their skis and who seemed to possess the most general knowledge about skis, were also the ones who maintained their skis most carefully. They flat-tired the bottoms twice or two times; they sharpened the edges at least once a week (all but one of all the paid sharpen edges at least once a week); they patch the base when needed. Another note on skis because the instructors were asked to examine their skis with a steel straight edge to determine flatness. 20 per cent found they were concave and needed for "ding".

Most models of 1984 in colored areas. For information about this year's models ski test on page 140.
