Supporting Adult Learning Great Britain. Further Education Unit, 1987. This guide deals with issues that should be considered by individuals involved in the education and training of adults. In particular, this document stresses the importance of processes of curricular design and recognition of a core of skills as a basis for learning. The first section discusses recent developments by the Further Education Unit's Board of Management, the DES PICKUP and REPLAN initiatives, the RESTART programme and the Adult Training Strategy, a national education and training strategy for adults living in the United Kingdom. The second section, which deals with designing curricula, outlines the aims, processes and content of provision and emphasizes that this approach is as relevant to the part-time recurrent nature of adult learning as it is to full-time programs. Opportunities and access are discussed next. The fourth section discusses some of the major national level initiatives that are currently underway to reform and coordinate further education and training. The fifth section is devoted to local initiatives to support and coordinate the provision of adult education and training with particular emphasis on the areas of negotiation, counseling and guidance, assessment and the design of flexible modes of delivery.
