The sun: A star near us

What is the sun?

The sun is a huge, glowing ball of gas and has a surface of over 5,500 degrees Celsius. It consists mostly of hydrogen and helium and is around 4.5 billion years old. Without the sun, life on earth would not be possible as it provides light and heat.

With a diameter of 1.4 million kilometers, the sun is about 109 times larger than the earth. It is also responsible for the so-called seasons through its change in position during the year, in which hydrogen is converted into helium.

The sun influences everything on earth. It controls the weather, the climate, the day-night rhythm and enables the growth of plants through

Sun in the solar system

The sun is the center of our solar system. All the planets, moons and comets orbit it, held in place by its gravitational force.

At 99.86% of the total mass of the solar system, the sun attracts everything around it. The planets have different orbits - the Earth takes one year, while the farthest planet, Neptune, takes 165 years.

The sun also influences the Earth's climate and the day-night rhythm. The sun's energy is the source of life on earth.

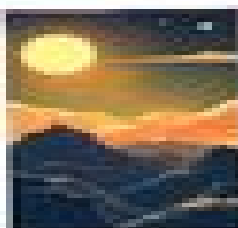

Sunspots

Sunspots are dark, cooler areas on the surface of the sun. They are caused by strong magnetic fields that block the movement of hot gas and cool the temperature.

Although they appear dark, sunspots are still very hot - around 4,000 degrees Celsius. Their number changes in a cycle of about 11 years, the so-called sunspot cycle.

Sunspots are important for research as they are associated with solar storms and magnetic field changes that can also affect the Earth.

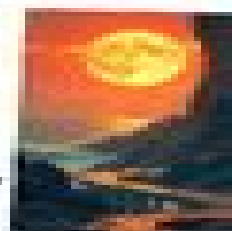

Structure of the sun

The sun consists of several layers. Inside is the core, where nuclear fusion takes place. From there, energy is transported to the outside.

The next layer is the radiation zone, where the energy is transferred to the outside. This is followed by the convection zone, where hot gas rises and cools down before sinking - creating a convection cycle.

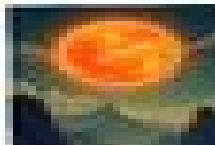

The outermost layer is the photosphere, which we see as the surface of the sun. Above this are the chromosphere and corona, which are visible as a glowing, fiery outer atmosphere.

Sunlight

The sun's light takes about 8 minutes and 20 seconds to reach the earth. It consists of visible light, ultraviolet and infrared rays.

Sunlight is essential for life. It helps plants to photosynthesize and provides us with vitamin D. It also controls the day-night rhythm of many living things.

Energy of the sun

Energy is generated by nuclear fusion in the core of the sun. Here, hydrogen atoms are converted into helium, which releases a tremendous amount of energy. This process generates light and heat.

Every second, millions of tons of hydrogen are converted into helium. The energy released in this process travels outward through the sun and finally reaches the earth as solar radiation.
