

TEACHING THE SPOKEN LANGUAGE

This paper falls into two sections. In the first section I shall make some remarks about spoken language which I shall then make use of in the second section. The second section addresses the problems of what it might mean to teach and to assess the communicative competence of adolescent native speakers of a language.

Section 1

I am going to draw three distinctions in this section which are certainly open to criticism. I have to introduce them briefly, with little justification, and the way I introduce them will be so simplistic as to be potentially misleading. In each case the distinction I draw actually involves a continuum, rather than two discrete categories, yet, in order to draw each distinction rather quickly, I shall be forced merely to characterise the end points of each continuum.

1.1 Primarily transactional and primarily interactional speech

The first distinction I want to draw is between primarily transactional and primarily interactional speech (cf. Brown 1978 and forthcoming)<sup>1</sup> I shall take it that primarily transactional speech is essentially message-oriented, where the main reason for speaking is that the speaker should transfer information to the hearer. Examples of primarily transactional speech would be: a driving instructor telling his pupil how to change gears, a person giving a friend an address, a doctor telling a nurse what treatment he wants to be administered to a patient, a cook telling apprentices how to bake a cake. In all these cases the hearer needs to be told the content of the message clearly and explicitly. If the message is not clear there will be <sup>1</sup> An adequate discussion would distinguish two scales here: more-or-less transactional and more-or-less interactional.
