

The Genetic Structure of High Performance Teams

Ten Core Innovation Strategies of New Product Leaders

Global commoditization and complexity now make innovation an urgent priority for firms of all sizes. And, to promote innovation in a meaningful way, small teams must be the focal point of your strategy.

This might sound perfectly logical. Why wouldn't you centralize at the point

Innovation is the main determinant of marketplace success where actual development takes place? But a surprising number of companies don't give their teams the freedom or resources they need to be effective.

Hierarchies, bureaucracies, and old habits have a way of smothering the best of intentions. Not so with leaders, those companies that generate more than twice the revenue from new products compared to their less successful peers.

They embrace entrepreneurial teams — often described as Agile teams in the technology industry — but that's only the start of the story, not the end. There are ten core strategies leaders use to promote innovation, and they pursue them with a vengeance.

Coordination Experience and Team Performance Cristian L. Dezso, Thorsten Grohsjean, Tobias Kretschmer, 2014 In cross functional teams team performance depends on how skillfully function managers carry out the cross function coordination of team members complementary expertise and activities In this paper we argue i that function managers coordination skills develop in part through the coordination experience gained from interacting with managers from other function ii that coordination experience has general and firm specific dimensions and iii that coordination experience leads to better team performance Using data on development teams in the electronic games industry we show that coordination experience and its general and firm specific components have a positive impact on the commercial success of electronic games and that this effect is robust to tests for omitted variables and reverse causality Our results have implications for the theory of learning and coordination in teams and for the strategy and practice of team design in project based organizations

Getting on the Same Page Katy B. Tran, 2012 ABSTRACT Team coordination has been an area of interest for researchers in military business social and cognitive psychology while only relatively recently emerging as area of growing interest for researchers in sport psychology Research on teams in sport traditionally has been focused on the social characteristics of the team such as cohesion and leadership. Additionally, when the role of cognition in skilled performance in sport has been examined, the interest primarily has been in the cognitive processes at the individual level. As a response, Eccles and Tenenbaum (2004) proposed a socio-cognitive conceptualization of team coordination in sport that has been used to frame much of the extant research in sport. However, to date, most research on team cognition and coordination in sport has been conducted using the individual as the unit of analysis. The present study is a response to the need for research that captures the experience of the team as a whole and in context to further understanding of cognitive processes underlying skilled team performance. A study was conducted with a men's collegiate soccer team over the course of a competitive season. Cognitive field research was used to investigate how the team developed, modified, and executed coordinated action in a natural setting. This method was selected on the basis that it affords the opportunity to capture contextual and social factors that influence the cognitive processes underlying skilled team performance. The key themes to emerge from the research were the importance of team members' long-term shared knowledge, moment-to-moment shared knowledge, and challenges to team coordination. The findings presented support the conceptualization of team coordination as a socio-cognitive construct. Furthermore, the results indicate that social properties of and social processes within a team impact the cognitive processes mediating coordination in teams. As such, the study demonstrates that the traditional focus on the cognitive processes of the individual removed from context might provide an incomplete explanation of the cognitive processes underlying skilled team performance. The findings have implications for current understanding of team coordination and for practitioners seeking to enhance the functioning of sports teams.

Detailed Analysis of Factors Affecting Team Success and Failure in the America's Army Game Kathleen M. Carley, 2005 Abstract We analyzed an extensive data trace of the on-line multi-player first person shooter game America's Army to understand the traits of the social and dynamic networks present in the game. Analyses were performed at the player level, team level, and clan level. Statistical analysis methods are used to examine the data at those three levels. In addition, the dynamic social networks of the teams are examined using a variety of social network analysis methods. Particular focus is given to discovering and explaining winning strategies employed by game players. From the analyses, some ways to win the game are revealed: top America's Army players, distinct behaviors, the optimum size of an America's Army team, the importance of fire volume toward opponent, the recommendable communication structure and content, and the contribution of the unity among the team members. Also, the analyses are compared to squad-level military research and some similarities and differences are found.
