

The Birth of British Rail

Here are the events, the men, the appearance and the atmosphere of Britain's railway system during the most momentous period of its 150-year life, the six years following the nationalisation of the four great Railway Companies on 1 January 1948 and the birth of British Rail, as we know it today. As well as telling of the early struggles to create the new system, Dr Bonavia traces the effects of nationalisation on train services, locomotive design and traction policy, and on the people who worked the railways. His personal involvement at the time lends a special authority to his opinions, some of them surprising and controversial, and his style is lively and readable. The photographs, many of which have not been reproduced before, make an attractive and relevant complement to the text.
