

Fossil Fuels

Fossil fuels formed around 300 million years ago. Back then, Earth was covered with green plants and other plants. When these plants died, they sank into the warm, dark mud of the ocean floor. Over time, they turned into a substance called coal.

Over time, layers of sand and other material built up over the coal. Heat and pressure transformed the coal into coal.

Population

During the Industrial Revolution, towns and cities grew in size as people moved there to work in factories. This made populations increase. For example, in 1801, Manchester had a population of around 10,000 people. By 1851, it had grown to about 100,000.

London in 1850

As populations expanded, towns and cities needed more water and for heating and lighting as well as to power factory machinery. Coal became a cheap alternative to wood or charcoal. As coal was burned, more carbon dioxide was released into the atmosphere.
