The Body of Poetry

Since Romanticism, the dominant movement of poetry has consisted of a continual thrust to transcend the defining physical limitations of the art, from Wordsworth's jettisoning of "poetic" diction in favor of a language like that of a "man speaking to men," through the transcendence of meter in the free verse revolution and of the line in projective verse. The most recent stages of the process have been the transcendence of voice in collage poetics and of syntax in fractal or disjunctive poetics, which now includes its own space for transcendence within repeated breaks in the language plane itself.

During this same period lyric poetry, like the other arts, has come partially to fill the role of religion in the spiritual lives of many educated secular humanists. As the individualized self has taken on more and more of a quasi-religious significance with the Romantic and Modernist movements (compare how ancient or even medieval poetry centered in social convention and allusions rather than the perspective of an individual self), the structural bases of poetry have been reorganized to reflect a new emphasis on the authentic experience of the individual soul, as opposed to communal experience, and on an aesthetics of transcendence as opposed to immanence. So, ironically, lyric poetry has itself taken on key spiritual and metaphysical characteristics of the dominant religion. These unspoken assumptions have come to permeate both mainstream and "avant-garde" contemporary poetics, a situation with implications not only for the content of spiritually-oriented poetry, but also for poetics on the deepest levels.
